Title: Imperialism, International Law and Global Justice

Imperialism has created the modern world. In recent times, philosophers and political theorists have taken an increasing interest in examining international law as a means of advancing the cause of global justice. This paper examines the different types of justice claims that have been made arising from imperialism. It explores the ways in which international law has attempted to address these claims, this as a means of assessing the strengths and weaknesses of international law as a means of achieving global justice.
